UK Steel on Elevated Levels of Elements on some Chinese Steel Imports

According to UK Steel, the trade body of UK steel industry, some of Chinese steel plates and sections with elevated levels of elements such as boron and chromium do not comply with the European standard for structural steel. It is claimed that such alloy additions can significantly affect steel when being welded as it can cause the steel to crack, which may not show up until 48 hours later. A similar problem is claimed to arise with copper-alloyed steel. The report further claims that these elements are added by Chinese producers to qualify the steel as "alloy" because these exports benefit from a tax rebate.
